Ian Ellingham is a leading and long time proponent of design excellence, author, teacher, chair of the Canadian architectural journal OAA Perspectives and principal of Cambridge Architectural Research Limited.

Over the past few decades, scientists and other academics have conducted considerable research into the human response to built form - trying to find answers to such questions as:

What forms the basis for our sense of beauty in the design of built space?
How do we use that understanding to better design both buildings and communities?

Ian will be exploring that research in the context of a lifetime in the industry working to refine and improve those sensibilities in a way that makes it easier to understand how to create buildings which are economical, pragmatic, sustainable and beautiful to the beholder.
